

Question 1: Which state now has the longest active streak of voting for the winner of the national electoral vote?

Answer 1: Ohio, which last voted for the loser of the electoral college in 1960, when it went for Richard Nixon.

Question 2: Which state now has the longest active streak of voting for the winner of the national popular vote?

Answer 2: New Mexico, which last voted for the loser of the national popular vote in 1976, when it went for Gerald Ford.

Question 3: Which state now has the longest active streak of voting within 5 percentage points of the national winning margin? (Explanation: Hillary Clinton has won the national popular vote by 1%, so states with anything between a 4% margin for Trump to a 6% margin for Clinton would make the cut in 2016.)

Answer 3: Pennsylvania and New Hampshire (tied.) Both states have voted within 5% of the national victory margin since 1992, last deviating by more than 5% in 1988, when Michael Dukakis almost carried Pennsylvania, and George H.W. Bush won New Hampshire in a blowout.
